Her friends, skeptical of these individuals, had tried to dissuade her numerous times, but to no avail.

Alarm bells only rang for them when Eva failed to come back to the dormitory the previous night, prompting them to seek help from a teacher.

The situation bore the hallmarks of schemes aimed at luring young girls into illegal activities.

“Have you contacted the police?” Hannah immediately inquired.

“Yes, we called them, but we could still reach Eva last night. They said it takes 24 hours to file a case. But we tried countless times this morning, there was no answer!”

Hannah offered a comforting pat on their shoulders.

“Relax. Do you know her whereabouts last night?”

Trinity quickly nodded.

“Yes, we do! She mentioned she’d be at Moonlight Bar. None of us had the courage to follow her, so we’re seeking your help.”

Moonlight Bar.

Hannah committed the name to memory and told the students, “Head back to your classes for now. I’ll take it from here. Trinity, send me a picture of Eva.”

“Okay!”

“We’re coming with you, Miss Moore!” The girls were adamant about finding their lost friend, but Hannah halted them.

“It’s best if you return to your classes. Should something happen while you’re with me, it’ll only complicate matters. Head back. I’ve got this covered.”

Trinity and her friends exchanged glances before turning to Hannah with a grave expression.

“Miss Moore, we need your help to find Eva!”

“Don’t stress, I’ll do everything I can. Now head back to your classes.”

After reassuring the girls, Hannah glanced at her timetable.

Realizing her afternoon was free, she quickly snatched her car keys and made her way to the Moonlight Bar.

Given it was still morning, the area outside the bar was deserted.

Pushing the door open, Hannah encountered a yawning waiter Leaning against the frame.

“We’re closed right now, Miss. Come back later.”

“I’m here looking for someone.”

Upon hearing that, Hannah proceeded into the bar.
