The hospital's vice president knew Brandon was there, so he personally went to receive him.

Soon after, the butler rushed to the hospital with the remaining half-filled glass of water.

"Here's what you asked for, Mr. Larson." Holding the glass, the butler walked towards Brandon.

Janet had specifically asked for the glass of water to be checked. Brandon had to take charge and arrange for the hospital's vice president to oversee the examination.

"Head over to the laboratory with the vice president. You're both going to oversee the examination results," Brandon ordered.

"Yes, Mr. Larson," the butler and vice president replied in unison, then turned around to head to the laboratory.

Just as they were leaving, the elevator doors opened, revealing Mandy's parents and her assistant. They walked in with worried expressions.

The assistant took a quick glance at the treatment room's door, then turned to Janet. "Has Mandy come out yet? How is she? Are we going to have to transfer her to another hospital or bring in a more experienced specialist?"

"She isn't out yet. We don't know what's happening inside," Janet said, her expression somber.

Zola Hamilton, Mandy's mother, turned pale, losing all the energy in her legs. She almost fell but was caught by Rhett Hamilton, her husband.

"Dr. Glyn, go check on Mandy's condition, please," Zola said to the family doctor.

"That.. I don't think that'll be appropriate." Some hospitals didn't really approve of other doctors entering the emergency room without their permission.

Janet turned to Brandon. He immediately understood what she was trying to say and nodded.

"Please go in, Dr. Glyn," Janet said after getting the silent permission. The doctor gave her a thankful look and rushed in.

Janet headed towards Mandy's parents. "Mr. and Mrs. Hamilton, I'm so sorry. If Mandy wasn't this wouldn't have happened."

Zola's cold gaze shifted to Janet. "What on earth did you do to her? She never had health issues. She's always had proper care. Why was she in so much pain?"

Mandy had always been Zola's precious daughter, raised and handled with care. Zola wouldn't have let her go out to work if she were sick. She only let her because she was in good health.

Janet lowered her head, and her heart sank. She felt awful.

"So you are actually the reason she's here?" Zola grew more agitated. "Just confess already! What did you do? And why did you do it?"

Zola charged at Janet, but Brandon stepped in, preventing her from hurting Janet.

Rhett knew it was a bad decision to be on Brandon's bad side, so he rushed to hold the raging Zola back.
