

Chapter 1305 The City Lord's Plan

In the City of Divinity.

Caden had traveled here with one purpose in mind: to meet the esteemed Citadel Guardian here known as the City Lord.

Currently, Caden, recognized as the most distinguished figure of the Rosefinch Galaxy, was seated across from the City Lord, exhibiting the highest degree of reverence and careful not to betray any sign of disrespect.

After all, the City Lord was acknowledged as one of the top ten most powerful Human Sovereigns in the Human Clan.

The City Lord took a sip of water and then invited Caden to speak. "What brings you here?"

Caden responded with a light laugh, "City Lord, I've come to discuss the noteworthy young man, Liam..."

He began to elaborate on Liam's recent valorous actions, especially emphasizing how Liam had survived two brutal attacks from a Blood Clan's Primogem Emperor.

Normally calm, the City Lord showed a slight trace of astonishment upon hearing that.

Had Caden not been the one telling him this, the City Lord might have doubted the story.

To survive two strikes from a Blood Clan's Primogem Emperor as merely a level-one Primogem Expert was not just impressive; it was an achievement the City Lord himself acknowledged he could not have matched when he was a Primogem Expert.

This led the City Lord to seriously consider the possibility of taking Liam as his disciple.

Seeing the subtle shift in the City Lord's expression, Caden knew the City Lord was moved. Caden couldn't help but smile proudly. "Liam won't let you down! He is indeed a genius of extraordinary potential!"

The City Lord gave Caden a glance, prompting him to moderate his enthusiasm.

Reverting to his customary calm demeanor, the City Lord offered a word of caution. "As I have previously warned you and Mr. Ellis, refrain from interfering excessively with Liam's development. Allowing him to face his own battles is crucial."

He knew all too well that excessive interference might ruin Liam's potential.

Caden's expression became serious, and he nodded in agreement before continuing, "Recently, Liam has been in pursuit of the Heart of Life fragments. Should I direct him to 'that place' to test his fortune?"

The City Lord's face turned grave, and he firmly shook his head. "If you wish to see him dead, go ahead."

Caden was momentarily taken aback.

It suddenly dawned on him that his concerns for Liam might have clouded his judgment of Liam's current capabilities.

The place he had mentioned was fraught with peril, even for Primogem Emperors.

Caden had stumbled upon the place entirely by chance.

It was a secret realm, and only those who could pass through it could get the reward.

Caden himself had not been able to pass the trials in that secret realm.

With this realization, Caden set aside the thought and shifted the conversation toward suggesting Liam as the City Lord's apprentice.

He said, "Shouldn't you consider taking Liam as a disciple? Many people have their eyes on him, and if you wait too long, someone else might take him away."

The City Lord appeared thoughtful upon hearing this.

Caden noticed the City Lord's interest and sensed that the idea of guiding such a promising talent was tempting to him.

However, the City Lord hesitated and then responded, "We'll discuss this later. It's too early to talk about it now."

Confused by the City Lord's refusal, Caden asked, "Why the delay? Liam is a great talent, and only you can fully develop his potential."

Instead of answering directly, the City Lord advised, "You should go back now."

Taken aback by the dismissal and feeling slightly wronged, Caden stood up and muttered, "If you don't want to take him as a disciple, just say so. There's no need to be like this..."

The City Lord heard Caden's complaint but chose to ignore it.

After Caden had left, the City Lord looked at the Celestial Palace and muttered, "Liam is that man's son. No matter how much I want to mentor him, it wouldn't be right..."

Indeed, the City Lord wanted a worthy successor to inherit his legacy, but he was aware of who Liam's father was. Any decision to mentor Liam would need his father's approval.

As the City Lord pondered this, a thought struck him, and he murmured to himself, "I should just ask Liam's father directly!"
