

Ex-Wife 1661

Chapter 1661

There had been many stubborn and fearless people like Stefan who had wanted to enter the cave, but they had died before they could get to the end.

The only person who had successfully passed through that cave was Stefan's guide, and he knew how dangerous that cave was.

He swore never to go close to it anymore.

Stefan gestured to show that he was going to enter the cave, then swam into it.

"Come back! Come back!"

The guide got so anxious that he wanted to take off the mouthpiece of his oxygen tank.

Unfortunately, Stefan had made up his mind, and swam deeper into the cave.

As he passed the heart-shaped cave entrance, Stefan felt like he had entered another world.

It was pitch black without any light, and he could feel seagrass against his legs, almost tangling them.

There was a gigantic cliff section beside him.

He couldn't see the top or the bottom, and people with weak hearts would surely be frightened out of their wits.

Heart pounding in his chest, Stefan looked around in the dark cave but found nothing.

His eardrums and chests were feeling uncomfortable due to the pressure at that depth and the long diving time, but he didn't want to give up.

If the legend was real, then the clam spirit had to be living in this cave, and the pearl should be here as well.

He figured he might get more clues to its location if he sang a song, like the fishermen said, so he started humming.

His voice wasn't that clear because of his diving mask, but the melody was there.

It resounded in the silent and vast ocean, and attracted a lot of fish, creating a magnificent Jackfish storm.

Fishes of various sizes swam around him in a circle, creating a cyclone of fish.

It might have been Stefan's song that attracted them, or maybe it was his sincerity and charm.

The song he was humming was the song he had played during their wedding—Let It Go With the Wind.

Back then, he had found the lyrics hypocritical and pretentious, with the singer wishing they could be as free as the wind so they could be with their lover forever.

However, now he teared up humming that same song.

It was ironic that he hated the song so much back then, but now he wished he could live with his beloved woman forever like the singer.

After singing the song, Stefan started feeling light-headed.

He knew he had used up too much oxygen, and he had to resurface.

The fish were dispersing, and his vision had started to blur, but suddenly, he saw a ray of light in front of him...
