

Chapter 383 Disappear

The people sent by Tyrone to Manmar came back with good news.

It turned out that Hobson was married and had children in Manmar.

When Tyrone's people arrived in Mallowsnow, they inquired from the people around and found out that after Hobson was taken away by Murray and the others, Hobson's wife and children were taken away by another group of people.

Tyrone guessed that the group of people who took away Hobson's wife and children should be Blayze's men. After those men caught Hobson, they threatened Hobson with his wife and children and then handed him to the police.

Blayze's people might have played a few tricks to ensure Hobson escaped from Murray before. They probably did it to get close to Hobson and threaten him.

After some time, those who took away Hobson's wife and children somehow slackened off, and Tyrone's people took the opportunity to save them. Now, they were in a being kept secret place, waiting for Tyrone's instructions.

When Tyrone got the news, he went to see Hobson's wife and children in person and then went to the police station to see Hobson.

Hobson was convicted ten years ago and couldn't escape from justice, no matter whether Galilea was innocent or not.

Therefore, Hobson would cooperate with whoever had his wife and children.

After Tyrone showed Hobson the video of Hobson's wife and children, Hobson agreed to cooperate.

However, the case was already closed. So Tyrone used his connections and got the case transferred to the prosecutor's office for a retrial.

To overturn the original investigation results, the prosecutor had to reopen the case for a second trial.

In order to ensure the case was reopened, Tyrone specially invited relevant contacts for dinner, one of whom was from the prosecutor's office.

Coincidentally, Carlson Kingsberg of Grand Tech, one of Tyrone's partners, was this man's brother-in-law.

The relationship between business and politics had always been complicated. The man's parents and brothers either worked in the government or the Public Security Bureau, and his sister was a lecturer at the university.

Last time, after being introduced to Tyrone by Carlson, he promised to help Tyrone get the case reopened. However, due to the large number of cases before the prosecutor, it would be a long time before it could be retried.

But this time, after Tyrone sent the invitation, he politely declined the invitation and explained the difficulties he was facing. His parents, who worked in the government, were under great pressure from above as a result of the help they rendered to Tyrone the last time.

Tyrone thanked him for his help in the past and didn't push it.

In fact, it was the same person who asked Aldrin to conclude the case in a hurry and pressured that man's parents not to delve into the case.

It was Kole Evans, the cousin of Blayze's biological mother. He currently held an important position in the department.

Since Kole was blocking all of Tyrone's efforts, the case was yet to be retried.

Tyrone couldn't help but feel helpless as he looked through all the pile of information he had gathered on Kole.

Once Sabrina finished shooting for the day, she went to the foundation around three in the afternoon.

After the foundation was established, she rented the first floor of an office building as her office. It was divided into several departments, and a few employees were employed. The foundation was operational now, but it encountered several problems. Sabrina needed to be there to make major decisions that she couldn't delegate to another person, so for the time being, she had to go to the foundation's office.

For a long time, Sabrina was immersed in work and before she knew it, it was already nine o'clock in the evening. Only the lights in her office were still on.

Sabrina stretched her body and prepared to call it a day. She turned off the power and left.

Since it was quite late, there were only a few people left in the building. No one was in the elevator when Sabrina got in. Unhurried, she made her way out of the elevator to the underground.

Sabrina was heading toward her car when a sudden flash of light nearly blinded her and a car's horn blared.

Sabrina blinked and quickly ran out of the path of the oncoming car.

A second later, a van whizzed past her.

Instinctively, Sabrina looked at the van and found that the side door was open.

Alarm bells rang in her head and she was certain that something was wrong. However, it was too late for her to run away.

A man popped out of the car and grabbed Sabrina before she even saw him move. Sabrina tried to struggle, but the man pushed her into the van and hit her on the back of the head with something blunt.

Sabrina's vision went dark and she passed out.

At ten o'clock, Sabrina's driver was beginning to get antsy when Sabrina still didn't come out. He called Sabrina's phone number, but no one answered.

Ever since the driver started to work for Sabrina, Sabrina's schedule was tight and often worked overtime or socialized until eleven o'clock.

It was only ten o'clock, so the driver wasn't worried that much. He thought Sabrina was still occupied, which was why she didn't answer the phone.

A few minutes later, he called her again. No one answered.

At that moment, the driver realized that something was wrong. He got out of the car and took the elevator to Sabrina's office to have a look. The door to the foundation's office was already locked.

Perplexed, the driver called Sabrina again. No one answered the phone.

By now, the driver was starting to panic. He glanced at the locked door once again and hurried to the monitoring room of the building to get the surveillance video. The people in the monitoring room were kind and allowed him to watch the surveillance video. Since a lot of people came in and out of the building, it would take some time before the driver could catch a glimpse of Sabrina.

After several minutes of watching the surveillance video, the driver finally saw Sabrina.

According to the time on the surveillance video, Sabrina entered the elevator and got out at thirteen minutes past nine. He could see that she went to the underground, but that was as far as the surveillance video covered.

There was a shopping mall next to the office building. People could get to the shopping mall through the parking lot. There was also a supermarket on the first floor of the shopping mall. Would Sabrina go there to buy something?

But it was over an hour now. Even if Sabrina went to the shopping mall, it shouldn't take her this long to buy things. And she wasn't even answering the phone.

"Where is the surveillance video of the underground garage?" the driver asked.

The staff of the monitoring room exclaimed, "Something was wrong with the monitoring system of the underground garage starting from yesterday. It hasn't been fixed yet. There is no security camera covering any part of the underground garage."

The driver was shocked.

His heart suddenly lodged in his throat.

How could there be something wrong with the security cameras when he needed to find Sabrina?

The driver was certain that this was no mere coincidence and that something was actually wrong with Sabrina. His hands trembled as he took out his phone and dialed Tyrone's number.

"He... Hello, Mr. Blakely. It seems that Miss Chavez is missing..."

When Sabrina finally woke up, her head was throbbing, but that was the least of her problems. She couldn't move her hands or feet, which meant that someone had tied her hands and feet and left her on the ground.

The room she was in was pitch black, so she couldn't even see her hands, let alone make out anything else.

The ground was cold, and the air was moist. The temperature had dropped, which caused Sabrina to start shivering.

Sabrina's heart sank as the moment in the underground before she was knocked out flashed across her mind.

Someone had kidnapped her.

But who would kidnap her? What was the kidnapper after?

If it was for money, it could be easily sorted out, and she might be safe for the time being.

However, she was afraid the motive behind this kidnapping was to get back at her.

After a long moment of struggling, Sabrina finally managed to sit up.

There was a faint smell in the air, and the weather was colder here than in the urban area. Sabrina suspected that she was now in the suburb. Judging by the smell, there was either a chemical plant or a ditch full of pesticide bottles around her.

Since she couldn't see anything, she couldn't tell if her bag or phone was here somewhere or if her kidnapper had taken it.

Sabrina struggled to loosen the binds on her hands, but it was cinched too tight.

She carefully explored her surroundings with her feet and accidentally kicked a brick.

Curling her feet around the brick, Sabrina pulled it closer and started using its sharp edge to hack at the rope.

However, the rope was too thick and her efforts made no difference. Before long, Sabrina heard someone talking outside.

"Okay. Is she inside?" The man's voice was a little shrill and loud.

"Have you brought the money?" This question was voiced by a different man. His voice sounded rougher but lower than that of the first man.

"Yes, I have. But I have to see her first."

When the man with the rough voice spoke again, he sounded a little anxious. "Can I lie to you? Give me the money. I'm in a hurry."

"No." Sabrina could hear the man with the sharp voice clearly. It seemed he was outside the door.

The thought had barely crossed Sabrina's mind when the door was suddenly opened.
