

Chapter 1077 Male Supporting Role

Trevor could almost imagine the expressions on the faces of Caitlin and the others once they saw the news.

He laughed giddily, enjoying the thought he had.

Perhaps they would be infuriated and regret they held a press conference.

As Trevor had guessed, Caitlin and her people lost it. After knowing that Asho, an internationally renowned director, was working with Trevor, they overturned a table in the hotel out of frustration.

It was at that moment they realized they had made a mistake. The press conference only gave Trevor free publicity, hence the rise of Sky Film and Television Company.

Since then, the business garnered insurmountable attention after Trevor announced his project with Asho.

People were filled with joy, excited for their upcoming movie.

Under Trevor's leadership and Asho's assistance, they successfully closed a deal for the male lead in their movie, who was none other than Lloyd.

He was not only the star but also a friend of the director.

His name held a reputation that no other actor could surpass in the entertainment industry, not even Travis. On top of that, he was the perfect guy for the role.

Meanwhile, the heroine surprised Trevor.

"Levi, don't worry. I will try my best."

Bess followed her father and gave Trevor a playful smile.

Amused as he was, Trevor was helpless. He didn't expect Asho would even get his daughter to join.

Besides, Bess had a charming beauty that could rival other female celebrities.

She even had a degree in acting, not to mention that she had a famous director by her side. It should be no problem.

Trevor returned the gesture and nodded.

"No problem. I'm looking forward to your performance."

Just as he finished his words, Asho pulled him aside and said, "There's one more thing. We still have a few supporting roles left at the investor's discretion. One of the roles is a soldier with excellent marksmanship. I don't want to rely on visual effects for this. I want real action."

Noticing the determined look in Asho's eyes, Trevor understood what he meant.

"No problem. I will tell Nicolas about it. He's the investor, which means he will be involved in this project then."

Asho replied, "Yes, I plan to let Nicolas have the final say on who will fill the spot. Good thing his men are trained soldiers. The role doesn't require much acting since we want him to be a stoic and strong man. I'll guide him."

With that, Trevor went to Nicolas' home with Asho. He briefly informed him of Asho's plan.

Nicolas chuckled. "You're asking the right person. My security personnel is composed of young men hailing from the army. I'm sure they will be interested in it. Come with me."

He escorted Trevor and Asho to the vast backyard of his villa and gathered the guards.

Despite his old age, Nicolas was still energetic. He shouted, "Guys, this is your chance to be in a movie! I need a strong man, a battlefield hero, who has remarkable accuracy as a marksman. Who can do that?"

The guards almost ruined their formation as they stood there in excitement. In that instant, several men raised their hands and volunteered.

"Mr. Bowman, I can do it!" one yelled.

Another offered, "Mr. Bowman, I can. I used to be in a play when I was in primary school."

"Me! Choose me! Mr. Bowman, let me have the role!"

With all the commotion, anyone could tell that many were eager to audition. Although they didn't slack off in their training, they did feel bored.

Naturally, they were in high spirits with such an opportunity.

However, things were getting out of hand. They couldn't continue with such unruly behavior.

Trevor touched his chin and suggested, "According to the script, we need someone who has an exceptional aim. Why don't we hold a shooting competition? It's fair and in line with the director's vision. What do you think?"