Norma's rage boiled over, leading her to strike Hannah across the face in anger.

Thrown off balance, Hannah hit the wall hard and collapsed to the floor.

Realizing the consequences, Norma feigned a pitiful sob, concerned she'd be held responsible for any injuries Hannah might have sustained.

"It was an accident! Tyler's debts are overwhelming us. We're swamped in bills. Debt collectors won't leave me alone. That's why I had to reach out to Janet. She's very rich. She wouldn't even notice if some of her money went missing. Without money, my kid and I would have no way out but..."

Hannah, still shaky, got to her feet. Her heart softened for the child, so young, and she urged, "Please, don't think like that. I'll help you out with some cash every month. I'll even work as a servant if I have to, but you can't go to Janet asking for money."

Struck silent, Norma assisted Hannah to her feet and handed back the child.

She had grabbed the child only to scare Hannah; raising a child alone was the last thing she wanted.

Exhaling wearily, she conceded, "Alright, I'll see if Janet will let me work for her. Since you're willing to help me financially, I'll stop causing problems."

Cradling the child, Hannah tried to stand up but winced, her back injured from the fall.

She was drenched in sweat and said faintly, "Quick, get a doctor. My back's killing me."

Norma gave Hannah a cold look and said casually, "Please, you were as strong as an ox back in the countryside. Take care of the little one yourself. I'm customers needing their dresses for upcoming parties, there was a rush. She was prepared to work late to get everything done.

Suddenly, there was a knock at the office door. It was Norma.

Filled with remorse, Norma said, "I'm sorry. I realized I was wrong on my way home. I acted on impulse, and I didn't mean it. Can I please stay and work?"

Janet never planned to fire Norma; she just wanted her to learn a lesson. She thought Norma could look for another job after gaining some experience in her studio.

After a moment's thought, Janet said, "Alright, but from now on, you've got to take your job seriously."

"Absolutely! I will!" Norma confirmed.

In the week that followed, Norma transformed into a different person. She assisted Lexi with filing, oversaw the deliveries, and had shed her lazy habits.

After watching Norma for some time, Lexi leaned over and whispered to Tasha, "My eyes must be deceiving me. Is that really Norma?"

With a level head, Tasha replied, "Something's off. Let's just watch and see what happens. It's not like someone with a mean streak turns sweet overnight."

Norma overheard Tasha's words and felt a sting of resentment.

However, Tasha's opinions were irrelevant to her. What mattered was that Janet recognized her newfound diligence.

And Janet did take note of her transformation, aware that Norma had her reasons for the sudden change.

While Janet was cautious of Norma potentially resorting to her old ways, she hadn't stepped out of line just yet.
